Ever wanted your own Steve Jobs turtleneck?

Well, now you can, starting at $500 you can bid on one of his shirts. aaaaaand it's up to 1,000,000,000 dollars now. That would best describe this auction. I wouldn't be surprised if they sold his pube for $100,000.

It seems that Jobs took a trip to Japan in the 1980s and was rather moved to see everyone at Sony wearing a uniform. He was keen to adopt the same sartorial consistency at Apple. He thought wearing the same corporate garb would help Apple employees come together--something school uniforms never seem to quite manage.

Jobs discovered that the Sony garb was designed by the fine Japanese fashion icon Issey Miyake. So he asked Miyake to create, dare one even imagine it, an Apple vest for all of Cupertino to wear.

Strangely, Apple employees expressed aggressively negative reservations about such a 1984-ish suggestion. "Oh, man, did I get booed off the stage," Jobs told Isaacson.

Warner Brothers reports own site as illegal

In a telling show of the flaws of the uncounterable DMCA, Film studio Warner Brothers has asked Google to remove its own website from search results, saying it violates copyright laws.

HOLY SHIT, RIGHT?

It also asked the search giant to remove links to legitimate movie streaming websites run by Amazon and Sky, as well as the film database IMDB.

Did you know I use MSPAINT To make these? Now you do...

The request was submitted on behalf of Warner Brothers by Vobile, a company that files hundreds of thousands of takedown requests every month.

See, this is why outsourcing is bad.

In one request, Google was asked to remove links to the official websites for films such as Batman: The Dark Knight and The Matrix.

Licensed online movie portals such as Amazon and Sky Cinema were also reported for copyright infringement.

"Warner is inadvertently trying to make it harder for the public to find links to legitimate content, which runs counter to its intentions," said Ernesto van der Sar, from Torrent Freak.
