

With a scene increasingly dependent on the commercial suicide it is as if the constant acceleration imposed by this age means that one can only perceive the effect of movement, but not the cause. Common Series offers a skyline of the electronic musical village. The dividing line between natural and artificial is constantly being reinvented and converted into a Dantesque travel about the discovery of the fantastic within the real. An indication of life on an expanse of electronic water where no vibration is lost.

The day rises on the A side and night falls on the B side. There where you go forward, you go backwards. Destination? Always unknown.

It's a comeback but everything is new and different. The joy of the natural elements is in contrast with the synthetic darkness, the essence is even more unique and inseparable.

Something of sacred shines but is made rust, nothing is as it seems and only a warbling bass will save you.
