Researchers at the University of Bristol have recently reached the conclusion that taste is affected by our mood. If we're feeling stressed or anxious, our ability to taste salt and bitterness diminishes. But when we are happy, our sense of taste is enhanced and we detect all flavours. The Bristol team claims that taste is affected by serotonin and noradrenalin, two brain chemicals which control mood. Levels of these chemicals are low in people who suffer from depression. Then, the discovery will ensure better and faster treatment of this illness. Doctors will now be able to tell if a patient lacks serotonin or noradrenalin simply by testing the person's sense of taste. This will make it easier for the correct drug to be prescribed, which is not always the case now.

1. Food and state of mind are closely connected. _____
2. In stressful situations, food tastes very salty. _____
3. Depressed people have higher levels of serotonin. _____
